Casualties Top World War I

WASHINGTON — (U.P.) — American casualties in World War II have surpassed those of World War I, an analysis of the latest official reports disclosed today.

In this war, 31 months of global fighting have produced 261,541 casualties as compared to the 259,735 casualties accumulated during the 19 months of United States participation in the last conflict.

A breakdown by categories shows:

This war—56,772 dead, 107,938 wounded, 55,903 missing and 40,928 prisoners of war.

Last war—53,878 dead, 201,377 wounded, and 4,480 prisoners.

The World War II figures were taken from four non-conflicting non-duplicating announcements:

ONE. The official war department anouncement of 179,923 army casualties through June 13 but not counting losses in Normandy and Saipan.

TWO. The official navy department announcement of 47,704 navy, marine corps, and coast guard casualties as of July 5, exclusive of losses on Saipan.

THREE. The announcement by the supreme Allied command of 24,162 U. S. casualties in Normandy through June 20.

FOUR. Adm. Chester W. Nimitz's announcement of 9,752 casualties on Saipan from the time of the landings on June 15 up to June 28.

Paraguay's agricultural bank will purchase all cotton growth in the country at $66 per ton, and Mennonite farmers in the Chaco region are granted $6.60 additional for each ton because of the added cost of transporting the cotton to markets.

Egyptians Left Pictures of Nile Sailing Vessels

Before the present war started, there was a rare Egyptian vase on display in the British museum. Perhaps this vase has been moved to a vault to save it from bombing, but we expect it to be on view again in a year or so.

The most interesting fact about that vase is the fact that it bears a picture of one of the world's oldest sailboats. The picture was made about 6,500 years ago!

What a sailboat that was! It had a prow which stood up like the long neck of a waterfowl. It is possible that the shape of the boat was copied after a goose or a swan.

Behind the high prow there is a single square sail. This sail points to the fact that Egyptians of many centuries ago used the wind to help them make trips on the Nile river.

Various other pictures of Egyptian boats have been found. These are not of quite the same shape, and some of them go back only 3,000 or 4,000 years.

It was common for Nile sailboats to be fitted with oars as well as sails. One picture shows two working oars on one side of a boat, and above the craft is a sail of oblong shape.

The outline of another boat was cut on stone. Thirteen oars were used on each side for rowing. In addition, there were three men who held oars at the stern. The men at the stern were pilots, and had the task of making their oars serve as rudders.

Sails on Egyptian boats were excellent when the wind could catch them with full force. They were hard to move around, however, and were of little use in catching side winds.

For that reason, the oarsmen often had the full task of making the boat go forward. The larger the boat, the more men there were at the oars.

With the passing of centuries, the Egyptians learned to make better boats for sailing. At length they built large boats, and launched them on the sea. Some of these vessels made trips across the eastern end of the Mediterranean.
