In large gobs seemed to be an important part of the setup. Young Roach's dad was having some little trouble with his human performers. The men weren't so bad. They seemed savage enough in their tiger skin breech clouts, but the ladies were about as prehistoric-looking as members of the Vassar field hockey team. That is, they were, until paleontologist Roach finished with them.

There was for instance. Miss Carole Landis, clad in a leather skirt and buckskin brassiere. Her costume looked on the prehistoric side, all right, but the makeup department almost gave up, trying ; to remove the permanent wave from her tresses.

Roach directed her to sit on a rock. Daintily she approached it. gracefully she lowered herself, and then she sat with her ankles crossed and her hands folded in her lap. Roach told her to forget for the moment that she was a lady. She did better when she tried again.

Roach instructed all his actresses to forget they were supposed to walk with their toes outward. He told 'em to shuffle as they moved. and not to bother about straightening their skirts, if any, when they sat down.

He insisted also that they keep lipstick off themselves and when we left the premises he was conferring with the property department about the manufacture of a triceratop. This seemed, according to the research staff, to have been a large beast with whiskers, capable of ruining a five-room bungalow with one well-placed kick.
