ALEXANDER SELKIRK, the true Robinson Crusoe, had some clothing in his seaman's chest when he was left on the island, but the supply ran short.

There was a roll of linen cloth in the chest, and he used it to make shirts. New trousers and a cap he made from goatskins. Having no needle or thread, he did the best he could. He had a pair of long stockings, such as were worn by men in those days, of the year. and sat down to take them apart so he could use the yarn as thread! for sleeping, Selkirk built another from his stockings. Although he had no needle, he had a few nails, and one of these he used to punch holes in the linen what he was using for thread through the holes. Happily the island was blessed with a good climate. The days ited the island in past times had were usually mild though there left two kinds of animals behind
