When an Assyrian king went walking, a servant held an um-brella over his head. The same custom was followed, at times, inside the royal palace. Not only did the umbrella shade the king from sunshine; it also came to be a sign of his office. The common people did not carry umbrellas. Nowadays the umbrella is used mainly to keep rain from the head, but it was seldom, if ever, used for that purpose in ancient times. The name "umbrella" means "little shade" or "little shadow."

The umbrella of Assyria had a rounded part of silk, linen or leather, making up the top, which was from two and a half to three feet wide. Around the rim were many small tassels, and on the cloth or leather was a picture of a flower or some other object.
