Lost: 'Just a Piece of Music'

4

By WILLIAM L. DOUDNA (State Journal Music Editor)

Every so often, someone comes up with a "lost" composition of one of the great composers—a Beethoven symphony, a Puccini mass, a Schubert song.

This is the story of a piece of music that almost was lost—a story that is both timely and indirectly associated with a Madison man.

It is the story of Johannes Brahms' "Trio in A Minor for Clarinet, Cello, and Piano."

If Walter Heermann's mother

hadn't been persistent at first and lucky at last, Walter Heermann wouldn't be playing the cello part of the trio at Music hall Wednes-

Mr. and Mrs. Hugo Heermann were in Frankfurt, Germany, and they met their friend, Johannes Brahms, on a street. He was carrying the manu-script of the trio to Clara Schumann, who lived at Frankfurt. Brahms, who had acquired a great love for the clarinet shortly before this meeting, asked Heermann to look it over.

"But we're on our way to a party," said Heer-"Never mind," said Brahms; "take it along, look the meeting and about the manuscript. As he talked, he saw his wife becoming pale and paler; she beckoned to him, and whispered.

He turned pale, too, and hurried to his host to say the Heermanns must leave.

While Heermann, as a boy, knew Brahms, he was associated directly with the composer of the trio which will open the program. The work is "Pastorale and Harlequinade," by Eugene Goossens.

When Goossens became conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, Heermann was the organization's first solo cellist. When the director found himself unable to conduct the annual series of youth concerts, he asked Heermann to take over.

Frequently, thereafter Heermann acted as assistant conductor in the regular symphony concerts, Romulo, first guest.

So Brahms walked away, and the Heermanns halled a cab. Walter's father carried his violin and his mother carried the manuscript.

A year later, he came to Madison as conductor of the Madison of Civic Symphony orchestra and Madison Civic Symphony orchestra and Madison Civic
